Background and Rationale

Food security and the resilience of food ecosystems are pressing concerns globally, with heightened urgency in regions such as the United Arab Emirates (UAE), which relies heavily on imported food and operates within a climate-challenged environment. The UAE's current food systems face significant risk in the event of border closures or global supply chain disruptions. While pockets of innovation exist, the broader system lacks the capacity, literacy, and collaborative structures needed to respond quickly and effectively to crises.

This professional education programme will address the urgent need to build resilience by fostering cross-sectoral collaboration, developing decision-maker food literacy, enhancing capabilities in data use and agritech, and identifying scalable solutions through challenge-based learning.

The food system resilience and food security UAE programme continues to place EIT Food education at the cutting edge of excellence in cross-sectoral teaching and challenge-based learning through alignment with the EIT Food Competency Framework, integrating technical and underpinning capabilities for a holistic programme.
